

Wild Art

Creating wild art is a great way to make you think a little differently about nature. You could perhaps try and find things that vary in colour and texture so that you had even more choice and can pull together something really wild.

What you could use (there's too much to list here, so this is just to get you started):

- Leaves
- Twigs
- Feathers
- Seeds
- Pine cones
- Seed pods
- Wool from sheep that's been caught on a fence post
- Grasses or flowers
- Pebbles
- Moss
- Mud
- Paper
- Glue
- String or wool

How many dimensions?

You could make a flat piece of art, or something like a sculpture, but you'll probably need somewhere dry to work out of the weather. If you are making a sculpture, then are you designing it to be seen from all sides, or do you just want people to look at the front/sides/back of it?

Obviously, you're going to need lots more materials if you're going to make something really big, so try and think about the size of your finished artwork too.

The rules are there are no rules

Yes, you did just read that right, there are no rules (apart from not taking anything from nature that already makes a home for an animal). So you can use your imagination to create whatever you like from whatever you like, which is one reason why making wild art is so brilliant.
